The Congress of the United States was pened in the customary manner, but the galleries of the Senate and House of Representatives were filled with people throb-bing with more than the customary anxety and interest. The prayers, too, of the Rev. Mr. Gurley in the Senate, and Rev Ir. Stockton in the House-especially that of the former-were of a more clevated and conciliatory nature than usual, and were devoted to a condemnation of those fears and hopes which was evidently uppermost in the minds of the crowding spectators. I do not know with what feelings Messrs. L. M. Keitt, William W. Boyce Milledge L. Bonham, Porcher Miles, and company, beheld the stars and stripes flying over both wings of the Capitol, but I do know that it inspired feelings not less it still flying on the morning after the bombardment of Fort McHenry, and which found vent in the passionate and descriptive one the Spenker's chair; and thile he looked the Spenker's chair; and thile he tive ode-the Sur Spangled Banner-now become national.
